Internet is one of the greatest tools we have today. Billions of bits of information, unlimited ways to connect, games to play, videos to watch, things to learn. I went for a long period of time where I didn't read a book. I finally got around to picking up a few new books and as soon as I started reading them, I struggled. I couldn't hold concentration like I used to. I would read a whole paragraph with my mind elsewhere or had this constant anxious feeling to do something else, even when there was absolutely nothing else to do. My mind would jump from one thought to another and I barely could read a chapter in one sitting. A talked to a few people about this, and I even looked to the trusty Internet for my solution. I found that I'm not alone, many p Buy this book. Better World Books. Amazon. An edition of My first book about the Internet (1997). Is it a curiosity about the inner lives of others? A desire to feel informed and up-to-date? I think that in reading for pleasure, there IS an element of wanting to connect with the characters, and with the author - it's a parasocial relationship in the same way that OnlyFans is a parasocial relationship - it feels personal, but is not really tailored for just you. It's for anyone who chooses to read/buy the book. The internet is far more addictive than TV ever was for me. Mainly because I could choose to simply not turn on my TV and pick up a book instead. But these days, especially because I WFH, I'm glued to my computer and my smart phone. books. In my perspective, I think that books are better than the Internet since they offer a great deal of TRUSTWORTHY information. By the way, Internet has bad effects for children like blackmailing, sexual activities and many more so let your child's be safe and let them know what are the bad effects of the Internet. Supposed the internet came out first than the book, which is better in any way anyway, can you still say that books are better when they just came out a few years ago? Posted by: fazz12. Report Post.
