Literary Bookish Styles: (scientific; official documents; publicistic newspaper; oratorical; poetic). According to I. R. Galperin (linguist, lexicographer: doctor of Philology, Professor) the set of style classes include: a) official business style; b) scientific professional style; c) publicistic style; d) literary colloquial style. In the essay they are commoner, for the reader has an opportunity to make a careful and detailed study both of the content of the utterance and its form. Articles. Irrespective of the character of the magazine and the divergence of subject matter "whether it is political, literary, popular-scientific or satirical, all the features of publicistic style are to be found in any article. The character of the magazine as well as the subject chosen affects the choice and use of stylistic devices. Scientific journals: Degrees of specialization. The standard format of journal articles. Reading the primary literature. Building knowledge and facilitating discussion. By convention, the scientist who performed most of the work described in the article is listed first, and it is likely that the first author did most of the writing. Other authors had different contributions; for example, Gene Sparling is the person who originally spotted the bird in Arkansas and was subsequently contacted by the scientists at the Cornell Laboratory of Ornithology. In some cases, but not in the woodpecker article, the last author listed is the senior researcher on the project, or the scientist from whose lab the project originated.
