

Catalogue of Ophthalmic Specimens, Photographs, and Other Exhibits at the Examination Hall, Thames Embankment, During the Annual Meeting in London, July 30th to August 2nd, 1895 - 1895 - G. Pulman, 1895 - British Medical Association

The British exhibits at the Great Exhibition "held the lead in almost every field where strength, durability, utility and quality were concerned, whether in iron and steel, machinery or textiles." [2] Britain also sought to provide the world with the hope of a better future. Europe had just struggled through "two difficult decades of political and social upheaval," and now Britain hoped to show that technology, particularly its own, was the key to a better future. [1] moved and re-erected in 1854 in enlarged form at Sydenham Hill in south London, an area that was renamed Crystal Palace. It was destroyed by fire on 30 November 1936.
