The poetical works of Skelton and Donne, with a memoir of each. by. Skelton, John, c. 1463-1529. Few poets of anything like Drayton's volume (of which some idea may be formed by saying that his works, in the not quite complete form in which they appear in Chalmers, fill five hundred of the bulky pages of that work, each page frequently containing a hundred and twenty-eight lines) show such uniform mixture of imagination and vigour. In the very highest and rarest graces of poetry he is, indeed, by common consent wanting, unless one of these graces in the uncommon kind of the war-song be allowed, as perhaps it may be, to the famous and inimitable though often imitated Ballad of Agincou With a memoir of each. Four volumes in two vol. II. See Lord Bacon, &c. it' the reader does not find much poetical merit in this old poem (which yet is one of Skelton's best [?]), he will see a striking picture of the state ^d magnificenoe kept up by our ancient nobility. 8 notes to volume I. during the feudal times. This great earl is described here as having, among his menial servants, knights, SQUIKES, and even bauons ; see v. 32, 183, &c., which, however different from modern manners, was formerly not unusual with our greater Bai^ons, whose castles had all the splendour and offices of a royal court, before the Laws against
