In one of those mythic twists of Nicaraguan history, Jose Fruto Chamorro, a mixture of dispossessed Indian and white landowner, founded a dynasty and became the first Chamorro to become president. For Don Fruto, the country was like a family: it needed a firm but affectionate father. Perhaps he lacked brilliance, but no one doubted his character. Nicaraguans say that if he had been alive when William Walker arrived in the 1850's, the American adventurer would never have seized temporary control of Nicaragua. The country enjoyed 30 years of peace in the second half of the 19th century. Man Nicaragua : The Chamorro Years. Boulder, Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1999, 252 p..
