Full-time employees have the security of an employment contract, a predictable working schedule, and a predictable income, that helps them to plan for the future by budgeting. Freelancers will not get paid for a single day that they don't work and often there will be no guarantee of next week's or next day's work. Full-time employees get a ready-made social network. Since they work with the same people every day, they are likely to become friends with most or at least few of them. Companies also organize social events and trips often for their employees. So it's more difficult for them to make friends and form stronger bonds. Whereas, full-time employment offers you much less time to spend with your family, friends and life partner due to regular office times. A job is only great when it's a match on both sides. So, continue to own your interviews and act like you are interviewing them. Because, after all, you are. Heather Hund.
